I wish I had read this book a year or so ago. I have 2 boys with very entrepreneurial spirits and I have been somewhat perplexed how to help them.

This book has given me the information and support to help them along the way. It is also good for parents whose kids are not naturally like this. He shares tips to inspire that attitude.

Just the book title is enough to make you realize that you might be raising your kids the wrong way all these while.

I watched an interview with the author about this book on the internet and it looked very interesting. I don't want my children to be so focused on money, but the author made it sound like it was more about being smart with money decisions and management which would be fabulous to teach the kids (and know myself).

Young Bucks is a great book that teaches parents how to mentor their kids to teach them how to be entrepreneurs and work hard to make money. It is simply and clearly written and full of important truths and inspiring ideas.

In the first part, Dunn helps the parent understand how profound his influence is on the child's attitude toward work and money. He teaches us how to change our attitudes and alter our approaches to our kids. Stop sending the message that work is a necessary evil, that security comes from working for a big company, or that your child's youthful, creative ideas are not likely financially viable.

Instead, we can cultivate in our children brilliantly creative minds. Help them dream. Teach them to organize their dreams in order to pursue them. Help them understand themselves and how they can key in on their unique perspective, talents, and interests in order to make money while doing things they love. Teach them to love working hard for a purpose. Train them not to fear failure, but to see it for the learning opportunity it is.

Dunn explains how to go about better understanding your child so you are prepared to teach them these lessons and mentor them as they move forward with starting a business. He gives about 30 ideas of businesses for the young entrepreneur. Dunn also explains how to handle many of the problems that will assuredly arise as an individual interacts with others while running a business.

I truly believe that entrepreneurship and leadership are two areas of our lives that must flourish if we are to be a free and prosperous people. Troy Dunn adds a competent, enjoyable voice to this discussion, and what he says ties in well with others, like Oliver DeMille.

I enjoyed taking notes as I read Young Bucks and read Dunn's explanation of things I first read about in DeMille's A Thomas Jefferson Education. Such lessons as: Individuals have unique missions, mentors are essential to raising principled, capable leaders, and education doesn't come from institutions - it comes from an individual putting in the work to learn from books, examples, and experiences.

For any parent, I recommend you read this book and consider how we can do a better job of teaching our kids just how unique they are - and why. They are not entitled because they are special. Instead, they have a responsibility to magnify their souls in the service of those around them.

Usually, financial prosperity increases our freedom to help those around us.

Already seeing some of my habits of money dialog that I am going to have to change.

Just finished and I finally feel like I have the ability to teaching my children about money. We have been using this to help set up my eldest's business and it's been going great so far. The other boys also seem to want a piece of the action and one is 4. I also feel like if I don't know something, I know where to start looking. There were also ideas and concept I had never thought of and probably never would have.

I bought this book super cheap as a kindle book and read it on my iPhone. They have an app for that.

3.5 star rating. Some great ideas in here!

I was pleased to see that this author would have approved of the fact that I had inadvertently followed almost all of his advice... instead of an allowance, I helped my son to start his own business where he has earned enough money to pay for his own summer camp, his own Cub Scout fees and many more things that he's wanted.

Excellent book by my business partner and friend, Troy Dunn, on creating a learn-to-earn, "millionaire mindset" with your children.

This book was on TV and they mentioned a few things about it:- he mentions using kids wants to help them find their own way to get it... smart!

Ages 6-10 help them take control of their wants- teach them how $a+b=c$

Ages 11-14- teach them their strengths

Ages 15-18 treat them like adults-let them learn from their mistakes/consequences.
