Race for the Mind Daniel G. Welch

A story about the audacious challenge to defeat one of our greatest socio-economic threats - Alzheimer's disease - and how the medical community and the pharmaceutical industry rise to face it. The pressure and enormous stakes of the Race for the Mind expose the most noble and misguided aspects of our humanity.

Dr. Darya Rostov, one of the greatest minds of a generation is stricken with Alzheimer's disease - she represents the 50 million people who are currently making their long journey into the night. Jack Callahan is the CEO of BioNeura, a San Francisco biotech company developing what could be the first breakthrough for patients like Darya. Dr. Nathaniel Shah, a brilliant neurologist rises to run SNS, a rival company based in Geneva, Switzerland and hides a terrifying secret. The plot tracks Callahan and Shah, each driven by very different things and their struggle within themselves and with each other. It should be all about the patients like Rostov – but alas, we're all human - and that sometimes gets in the way.

Honestly, I just couldn't get into the book. After drowning the Falcon, which made me want to put the book down, I kept reading until I reached 11%. Seemed to go off in too many directions and I couldn't keep my mind on the book. The writing was good and others may thoroughly enjoy this book. It just wasn't the Genre' I enjoy. I did win this in a Goodreads giveaway and I feel bad that I couldn't finish reading.

This book is essentially a procedural, it details the development of a new drug from its first discovery in a University research laboratory and through FDA certification. Along the way we get an idea of the costs involved and the numerous hurdles that must be successfully jumped. It is easy to see how even a potentially impactful medication can get lost along the way. It is an interesting and informative story but not really a medical thriller. There is some drama and mild suspense on occasion but if you are looking for the next Crichton this is probably not for you.
