I love the Hyotei guy who points to his eyes whenever he says something deep. It reminds me of that 'Friends' episode where Ross touts the karate concept of 'unagi' (sp?). Hey, Hyotei--get over yourselves, and there's no way you're going to beat Kunimitsu in second singles (I hope...).

I love how now the author skips a head in matches to keep things fresh and alive. Seeing a lot of the same things when we already know what's going to happen is annoying, but now things are super fresh and new! :)

Seigaku's match against Hyotei Academy begins - and, as always, there's tons of drama and a lot of magical tennis action. Momo runs into a pole during his match and gets all bloody (Momo, you know James Blake ran into a pole too, right? He broke his neck.). Luckily, a side effect of hitting magical shots is having a magical body; not only do the suspiciously-absent umpires allow Momo to play, but the blood loss doesn't affect his playing at all. We also see the opening to some Kyushu flashbacks with Tezuka as well as some intense Inui/Kaidoh doubles. Such madness!

As always, I wish the series stuck a little closer to real tennis, and the initial conflict of the pressures Ryoma faced as an underclassman on an upperclassman team. That said, I do like where the series has gone since then... I just don't love it.

Also, I will forever wonder why Miyuki was halfway up that giant tree when Tezuka stumbled across her racket.
