For many people, half a loaf is better than none. Such is not the case for the "Dozen." For this conglomeration of foreign powers with wealth beyond most imaginations, the election of Jim Hernandez as the president of the United States was just the first chapter in what they expected and believed they had paid for-the demise of the Capitalistic organization of the United States and its allies.

The architect of this strategy, whom they had placed their trust and monetary support in, was Eric Andros. He of the desire and goal to become the richest and most powerful man in the world. Unfortunately Eric had underestimated the resolve of the American public personified by the New Wave Patriots and he became a casualty of the war plan he had conceived and led through its earliest stages.

So now what to do? The financial backing and desire to see the plan through to a positive conclusion was every bit as strong for the "Dozen" but who would become the leader for achieving their uncompleted cause? Those of Eric's closest associates were still intact and well versed in the tactics that had taken them this far. But who had the passion and desire to go forward with the implementation of this most ambitious agenda? In addition to the gap in its leadership, this group of modern day opportunists had many other questions to answer if their reorganization of resources was to have any chance of success. Would they be doomed to suffer the same rebuke by the American ingenuity that had been the rallying cry of the country since the days of the Boston Tea party? In no manner of priority, the questions at or near the top of the list included "who and how was anyone able to get close enough to Eric to neutralize him?" Right on the heels of that question was "where did the "war chest" of $37billion disappear to?" And finally but by no means last, "who would be the leader of these pirates of democracy as they renewed their resolve to bring capitalism to its knees?" The "Dozen" were not the only ones with many questions to answer. The New Wave Patriots were now financially in a position to go forward with their own agenda for renewing the strength of democratic ideals that had been attacked by its enemies. Who would be their leader for implementing the plan to achieve their lofty ideals and what would be their tactics to keep the Dozen at bay as they launched this counteroffensive? Difficult times demand tough choices and much sacrifice on the part of those who would wear the mantle of leadership. Come along on the journey traveled by "Born of Necessity" as these two counteracting
