Demon Spirit, Devil Sea Charlene D'Avanzo

When the United Nations sends Maine oceanographer Mara Tusconi to Haida Gwaii fifty miles off British Columbia, she's thrilled. The archipelago is both a spectacular rainforest and world class sea kayak destination. But as she untangles an international climate change crime, Mara confronts the Haida Nation's mistrust of outsiders like her, spiteful spirits that aren't suppose to exist, and the baffling death of a young Haida watchman.

Thanks to the author for sending me a copy of this book. A mystery involving romance, marine life, ecology, and a bit of the supernatural. If you like science, especially ocean life, you will probably be interested in this series.

Maureen says

Great read. There's a mystery , but there is also a little mystical background and some factual truths about environmental issues. Interesting and entertaining.

John says

I enjoyed this murder mystery story that was surrounded by a simply beautiful description of underwater life, island life, Native Indian life, all set within a scientific expedition outlook on it. This is definitely a book for anyone interested in having a better understanding of the relationship between nature and humanity, as well as the potential for its destruction. It was also a story of discovery of the spirit soul within each of us. This is a voluntary review of an Advanced Readers Copy of this book.

Charlene D'Avanzo has written another entertaining whodunnit about oceanographer and kayaker Mara Tusconi. Mara and two cohorts go to the remote islands of Haida Gwaii in British Columbia to assess the environmental impacts of a scam. The scam was presented to the local First Nations people as a way to enhance salmon runs.

D'Avanzo does a great job capturing a sense of the landscape, seascape and culture of the Haidi Gwaii region.

I give this 3.5 stars. This is the second book in the cli-fi series by Charlene D'Avanzo. This book takes the series protagonist, Maine based oceanographer Mara and two colleagues, to the Haida Gwaii archipelago to investigate the environmental impact of the dumping of tons of iron sulfate iron into the fishing waters off of the Haida Gwaii islands. I loved the descriptions of the forests and waters and found the discussion about traditional cultural interesting.
